ACHILLES — WHO NEVER FEARED

EVEN AS TODAY, the world fathers of mighty men plead and bribe with up more than any other sport today is football.

Centuries ago—more striking still—in the year 1200 B.C. the great rulers of Troy on the coast of Asia Minor were the masters of the known world. Their power and influence extended to the shores of Asia Minor, even into the heart of Europe. Their fame was spread by the bold seafarers of Phoenicia, and the rich trade with Greece, Mycenae and Assyria.

But the end of the great Trojan empire was in sight. Agamemnon, the ruler of Mycenae, was the most powerful of the Greek kings. He could raise a mighty army and fleet of ships. He was jealous of the wealth of Troy, and planned the conquest of that city. Helen, the wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta, was the most beautiful woman in the world. Paris, the son of Priam, king of Troy, had visited Sparta, and had carried off Helen to Troy. Menelaus and Agamemnon were brothers. Menelaus appealed to Agamemnon to help him get back his wife. Agamemnon saw his chance to get the better of old Priam. He gathered together the flower of the Greek empire, with Achilles, Ajax, Diomedes, Odysseus, Nestor, Menelaus and Agamemnon himself. Achilles was the best warrior of the Greeks. He was the son of Peleus, king of Phthia, and Thetis, a sea goddess. Thetis had dipped her son in the River Styx when he was a baby, and so made him invulnerable. Only the heel by which she held him was not touched by the water. Achilles was brought up by Phoenix, and was taught by Chiron, the centaur, to be a great warrior. He was also a great musician, and could play the lyre and sing. He was a great athlete, and could run very fast. He was also very handsome. He was the idol of the Greek army.

Agamemnon, Menelaus and Achilles sailed with their army and fleet to Troy. They landed on the coast of Asia Minor, and marched to the walls of Troy. The Trojans had no chance against the Greeks in the open field, so they shut themselves up behind the walls of Troy. The Greeks could not take the city by storm, so they settled down to besiege it. They built a camp on the shore, and drew up their ships on the beach. They built huts for themselves, and stables for their horses. They made a market-place, and a place where they could hold their games. They also built a temple to Apollo, to get the help of Apollo.
